Abstract

Note: In this essay, the term “Chicano” is used because it was the identifier claimed by historical participants in the Mexican American Movement in the United States throughout the 1960s and 1970s. The Mexican American Movement is a term that has been expanded since its inception in the mid-1960s and that has addressed many different social, cultural, political, and economic issues, but it mostly focused on four: land ownership, workers’ rights, and educational and political equality.¹ In the context of this discourse, the authors offer that the Mexican American Movement is synonymous with the Chicano Movement. The authors also utilize the contemporary term Latinx to refer to a person of Latin American origin or descent.²

Along with other civil rights movements like Black Power, women’s liberation, and gay rights that were initiated and sustained in the United States during the 1960s and 1970s (and beyond), the Chicano movement (also known as El Movimiento) advocated for social justice by using independent publications to amplify its message. Independent publications are defined in this context as periodicals produced without approval from established publishers and presses or against the wishes of a dominant governmental, or institutional group.³ Newly accessible and affordable design technologies such as offset printing and production technologies brought about a rise of independent publishing in the U.S. in the 1960s—especially in urban American settings—and helped fuel the rise of the American activist-designer. The ability to utilize these types of publications to disperse information quickly to targeted audiences allowed for the correction of at least some of the disinformation about the Chicano movement that had begun to appear in the traditional, American “white press,” and in the so-called mass media of the time. For example, the independent Los Angeles newspaper and magazine La Raza observed in 1969 that neither the Los Angeles Times nor the Herald Examiner published many stories about Mexican-Americans, and in the stories they did print, 80% had been, in the words of one scholar, “sensationalized reports of crimes allegedly committed by Mexican-Americans.” Activists within the Chicano community designed and wrote these publications to serve as a record of social, political, cultural, and economic events, and encourage their readerships to act by unionizing, boycotting products, and marching in demonstrations to advocate for social justice. After documenting and critically analyzing the Chicano publications archived at research centers at universities in California and Texas, the authors observed the repeated usage of a unique genre of formal patterns utilized in the compositions of the cover designs of many of these Chicano publications. The authors are using these critical observations to posit that these graphic compositions constitute a distinctive Chicano visual language that consists of original, stylized deployments of imagery, icons, and masthead typography, and that this visual language was operationalized to visually communicate the socio-cultural locations of the issues these publications were addressing in ways that would effectively resonate with their particular audiences. The visual languages that affected the compositions of the covers and, in some cases, the interior page spreads of these independent Chicano publications (i.e., newspapers, newsletters, flyers, and small magazines intended for readerships in areas such as Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, and California) were critical to the formation and sustenance of the Chicano visual and socio-cultural identity and the role these played in visually communicating the ideals of the Chicano movement across the American southwest.

The visual essay and narrative organized for Dialectic is titled En El Frente, which translates from Spanish to English as “On The Front.” It documents and analyzes some of the ways that the assertions and formal arrangements of these uniquely Chicano visual language elements and compositions were used in these publications by the designer activists who created them to advocate for social, economic, and political justice in and around their communities. Between approximately 1966 and late 1979, over 300 Chicano publications from 150 communities (mostly in the American southwest, but also in Chicago, Illinois, Brooklyn, New York and Washington, D.C.) were designed and distributed across the United States, and together they constitute an important addition to the predominantly white American design canon. By making this particular historical analysis of periodical publications designed and written by Chicanos more accessible to contemporary design practitioners in the U.S. and around the world, the authors seek to expand the canon of historical approaches to engaging in and executing visual communication design processes in ways that might positively influence these processes, particularly in the U.S., so as to make them more broadly informed, equitable and inclusive.
1 Grigg, Jenny. “Materials and Tools as Catalysts of Invention in 1
Online. Available at: https://www.commonlit.org/en/texts/
2 Ramos, E.C. “Notes to the Reader,” ¡Printing The Revolution!
The Rise And Impact Of Chicano Graphics, 1965–Now, edited by E. C. Ramos. Washington, D.C., Princeton, NJ, USA:
Smithsonian American Art Museum, in association with 3 McMillan, J. C. Smoking Typewriters: The Sixties Underground
Press and the Rise of Alternative Media in America. New York:
Oxford University Press, 2011: p. 3.
4 Andrade, F. M. “The History of ‘La Raza’ Newspaper and Magazine, and its Role in the Chicano Community from 1967-19.
5 Andrade, F. M. “The History of ‘La Raza’ Newspaper and Magazine, and its Role in the Chicano Community from 1967-
1977.” p. 5.
6 Estrada, J. “Chicano Movements: A Geographic History,” Mapping American Social Movements Through the 20th Century. Online. Available at: https://depts.washington.edu/
En el Frente (On the Front):
How Activist-Designers in the Chicano Movement Developed a Distinctive Visual Language to Fight for Social Justice in the U.S.

ALEXANDRIA CANCHOLA & JOSHUA DUTTWEILER

A Contextual Analysis of the Front Covers of Chicano Independent Publications

The turbulent economic, political, and societal unrest that shook many areas in the U.S. during the 1960s and 1970s fueled the cultural conditions necessary to facilitate the activation of the group that evolved into the radical minority Chicano movement (or El Movimiento), as well as the rise of movements and campaigns for social justice that were facilitated by other parallel American political and socio-cultural groups. These included but were not limited to Black Power, women’s liberation, and gay rights. The Chicano movement was an initial attempt to shape a unified ideology that served the interests of the Mexican American working class. Independent publications written, designed, and distributed by Chicanos served as important engines that guided and drove the construction and sustenance of the Chicano movement. They proved to be instrumental in helping Chicanos establish communities and helped define both their collective and more localized identities. These publications proved to become, in the words of one scholar, the “primary educational tool and propaganda [vehicles that supported]... the movement,” and helped to articulate a definition for what it meant to be Chicano. They recorded and critically analyzed the injustices and violence faced by Chicano communities across the U.S., and issued and promoted calls for Chicano workers to unionize, boycott products, and march in demonstrations as ways of organizing and advocating. for social justice. This visual essay and the narrative that accompanies it explores and examines how various aspects of their graphic design work supported their missions.

The authors began their endeavor by visiting the Special Collections archives at the Texas A&M University-Corpus Christi, the University of Texas Rio Grande Valley, the University of California at Santa Barbara, the University of Southern California, and the University of California at Los Angeles. Each of these Special Collections housed editions of independent Chicano publications that had been published in the 1960s and 1970s in California and Texas. Both of these states were hubs of several organizations that were integral to the development and sustenance of the Chicano movement and the social, economic, and political activism that it guided and fueled during the 1960s and 1970s. These archives house the corpus of Chicano independent publications that were written, designed, and distributed in the U.S. during this time. Critically assessing the graphic design of these publications, which also involved comparing and contrasting the different thematic and aesthetic approaches that were undertaken by their designers, would have been difficult-to-impossible without being able to see and contemplate their wide variety firsthand, as many of them have not been digitized. Analyzing them has the potential to reveal new design knowledge and understandings, which could not have been shared without this undertaking. This process of studying these publications within these archives, and particularly the designs of their covers, and then compiling and curating a collection from among them to understand and expand the historical canon to include the work of Chicano designers and authors is akin to that of other contemporary research projects such as Gráfica Latina and The People's Graphic Design Archive.

As the 1960s progressed and newly improved offset printing processes made the printing of a broad array of publications more affordable, the production and distribution of independent publications across the U.S. (and much of the rest of the so-called developed world) became much more widespread. Within the American Chicano community, the number of publications grew rapidly, from less than 10 at the end of 1964 to more than a hundred by the end of 1969. There was great diversity among these publications, which included newspapers published by non-governmental organizations, such as The United Farm Workers' El Malcriado (The Spoiled One) and The Texas Farm Workers' Union El Cuhamil, the Brown Beret’s La Causa (The Cause) and Regeneración (Regeneration), as well as newspapers

---

11 Institutional archives visited: Special Collections and Archives, Mary and Jeff Bell Library, Texas A&M University-Corpus Christi, Corpus Christi, Texas; Department of Special Research Collections, UC Santa Barbara Library, UC Santa Barbara, Santa Barbara, California; Special Collections and Archives, University Library, University of Texas Rio Grande Valley, Edinburg, Texas; Institute of American Cultures, Chicano Research Center Collections, University of California, Los Angeles, Los Angeles, California; Special Collections, USC Libraries, Chicano and Latino Studies, University of Southern California, Los Angeles, California.

13 McMillian, J.C. Smoking Typewriters. p. 4.
The Chicano Press Association was created by activists in 1969 to serve as an internal organ of communications between these publications and their readerships by sharing a given community's local stories about history, literature, and news-based concerns with other Chicano publications across the U.S. This helped this diverse but philosophically united group of publications maintain consistent communications and helped galvanize support for the Chicano cause across the country.

These publications strove to give voice to the issues that mattered most to American Chicanos during this time, covering politics, labor rights, economic, and social justice concerns to counter and correct much of the disinformation disseminated in many American mass media portrayals of the Mexican American experience, or to supplement a lack of information about it that was then all-too-prevailent in the traditional, mostly white-controlled American media of the time. These publications were an important, and, in some American locations, the only means for Chicano audiences to gain information about, much less interact with, the Chicano movement.

Chicano newspapers were typically distributed on urban street corners, where they were stacked in piles for passersby to pick up. To attract reader attention, the newspapers that comprised the Chicano Press often adopted popular American underground press cover styles of the day that incorporated compositional approaches such as the use of photographic collage and simple line drawings to communicate ideas of outrage, protest, rebellion, and freedom. They also incorporated several distinctive visual elements into these designs that, as the 1960s gave way to the 1970s, became recognizable as some of the key components and motifs inherent in the visual identity that sought to communicate the core ideas that informed the Chicano movement. These components and motifs can be seen throughout the array of Chicano press newspaper covers that are depicted within this visual narrative, such as imagery that represents or is derivative of Aztec, Mayan, or Olmec art, are deployed within geometrically simple combinations of shapes and linework in asymmetrically balanced compositions. By incorporating art and design work that was socio-culturally significant and relevant to their Chicano target audiences, the designers of many of the Chicano press newspapers were able to visually communicate messaging that helped mobilize these historically under-represented groups toward social, political, and economic action.

The En El Frente (“On The Front”) visual narrative has been designed to function as its own independent Chicano publication. The authors seek to engage and enlighten the audiences for our work and the readers of this piece by emulating the front pages of historic Chicano newspapers. In each section of the visual essay, the authors imitate important elements of editorial design and analyze design decisions made by Chicano activists and activist designers to make the techniques visible to readers. We employ the unique visual style of those publications in our work by incorporating iconography rooted in Mexican and Mexican American art and design work, as well as bold phrases that were featured in posters of the Mexican revolutionary period (November 20, 1910–February 5, 1917). Like the Chicano activists, the use of iconography in this visual essay creates a conceptual and historical connection to the ongoing fight for social justice that historically faced the Mexican people. The visual connection to the Mexican Revolution of 1910 and the figures of Pancho Villa, Emiliano Zapata, and La Adelina empowered and unified the Chicano movement by emphasizing references to the revolutionary heritage of many Mexican American people. Like the Mexican Revolution, the Chicano movement strove to empower the poor and the working class by advocating for, and, in some instances, directly or indirectly implementing social and political reforms. Additionally, the authors make use of printing methods and imagery that art historians Charlotte Benton, Tim Benton and Ghislaine Wood refer to as “Aztec-inspired art deco,” a genre of art and architecture that employs heavily stylized, geometrically basic, block-printing techniques, as well as the incorporation of syncopated patterns comprised of abstract forms. Examples of this can be seen in the visual essay En El Frente’s masthead (page 1), and in the decorative page borders (pages 2, 4–6) as well as in the 1971 and 1972 versions of front covers of La Gente (page 9).

As we navigate our present moments of civil and societal unrest in the United States, and the ongoing fight for social justice that has and continues to accompany it, revisiting parallel moments in American history provides an opportunity to learn from how and why past designers devised the visual communication strategies that they did, and then created and disseminated work guided by these to promote and foment advocacy and activism. Many current cultural, social, technological, economic, and political issues that affect the lives of Latinx communities in the U.S., such as working in unsafe..." conditions, earning non-livable wages, and having to deal with immigration insecurity and police violence, bear striking resemblance to the labor strikes, deportation policies, police violence, and lack of equitable education occurring in many areas of the U.S. during the 1960s and 1970s that inspired the Chicano movement. The authors hope that this critical examination of the visual languages, imagery, and compositional structures employed across the design of many independent American Chicano newspapers published during the late 20th century encourages contemporary designers, historians, and design students to consider the power of community-focused publications to facilitate positive action and social change. Whether the intent is to provide a means to alter undesirable sets of circumstances or as a means to engage and support contemporary design practice, gaining a deeper understanding of the design decision-making that guided the development of this work has the potential to yield new design work that is relevant and actionable.

The increasing disappearance of community-run newspapers — whether this occurs in the U.S. or anywhere else in the world, and whether these appear in print or as online entities—results not only in less-well-informed societies, but in the creation of an information vacuum that, especially since the widespread advent of social media, tends to be filled with mis- and dis-information. Social media platforms allow for individuals to report their often myopically informed, not deeply considered opinions on local levels and these platforms utilize algorithms that control the visibility of certain types of content, and, “can modify patterns of individual exposure in opaque ways, often prioritizing content that provokes extreme reactions from users.” In other words, these algorithms can and do limit what many social media users see and read within narrowly confined realms of content and context.

The gradual consolidation of news companies over the past 20 or so years has left many American communities without the ability to add their critical perspectives to the often singularly biased, white-majority national news stories that have become prevalent across the U.S. The effect of not reporting, much less analyzing, locally sourced and relevant information is felt widely in the United States and has resulted in the kinds of societal polarity that exacerbates issues such as immigration, labor rights, policing, and responses to the Covid-19 pandemic.

In closing, the authors advocate for contemporary designers in the U.S., along with design researchers, scholars, historians, and students, to look to the designer activists that helmed the independent Chicano publications that were published in the 1960s and 1970s for cues regarding how they might effectively advocate for social, economic, and political justice. A few examples of independent publications from contemporary designer-activists or organizations are described as follows.

---

- Isabel Ann Castro, co-founder of St. Sucia, a contemporary Latina/x feminist magazine based in San Antonio, Texas from 2014 to 2018 that covered topics such as reproductive justice, education, gender identity, and immigration, used this publication to describe her experiences of creating a contemporary publication as a continuation of the independent Chicano publications that operated in the U.S. in the 1960s and 1970s. 26

- Guadalupe Pardo is a south Texas-based Latinx designer and artist who began producing the zine The History of Policing in the Rio Grande Valley in 2019, which makes use of archival material from independent Chicano publications from the 1960s and 1970s to help frame and inform their examination of the history of abusive policing in Texas’ Rio Grande Valley. 27

- Latinx artist Julia Arrendondo writes about her experiences involving the independent publishing of zines such as Guide to Being Broke and Fabulous, Guide to Being Alone, Easy Magic, and Baltimore Break-ups: A Pop-Up Memoir, as “a practice of empowerment... sharing iconography/narratives that attract like-minded individuals... when no other platforms were available for support.” 28

- Sherwood Forest Zine Library in Austin, TX, USA holds an archive of work by contemporary artists and designers who have produced independent publications exploring topics such as labor movements, activism, and other grassroots efforts that have paralleled the content that was published in independent Chicano publications across the U.S. from the 1960s and 1970s. 29

Contemporary iterations of these types of publications continue to empower local communication from activist-designers who communicate directly with their communities, and who provide valuable information concerning their collective well-being and assistance as they advocate for social, political, and economic justice. They, and the independent Chicano publications that appeared in the U.S. during the 1960s and 1970s that preceded them, can serve as inspirations for contemporary designers, students, researchers, scholars, and historians who seek to address and combat disinformation and injustice both within contemporary Latinx communities and beyond them.

Visual Essay Image Citations

Chicano Newspapers, 1970, Collection 42, Box 3, 7, Dr. Leonardo Carrillo Papers, Special Collections and Archives, Mary and Jeff Bell Library, Texas A&M University-Corpus Christi, Corpus Christi, Texas.

Chicano Newspapers, 1962-1986, Collection 118, Boxes 1-5, Johnson-Bezdek Collection on Opposition Politics in Twentieth-Century Mexico, Special Collections and Archives, Mary and Jeff Bell Library, Texas A&M University-Corpus Christi, Corpus Christi, Texas.

Chicano Newspapers, 1970-1980, Collection 116, Boxes 1-5, Judge and Mrs. Lorenzo Rojas Papers, Special Collections and Archives, Mary and Jeff Bell Library, Texas A&M University-Corpus Christi, Corpus Christi, Texas.

Chicano Newspapers, 1970-1980, CEMA 80, Boxes 1-4, Chicano Movement Newspaper Collection, Department of Special Research Collections, UC Santa Barbara Library, UC Santa Barbara, Santa Barbara, California.

Cuhamil, 1975-1978, Edinburg Chicano Collection 116, Boxes 1-2, Texas Farm Workers Union, Special Collections and Archives, University Library, University of Texas Rio Grande Valley, Edinburg, Texas.

UNITE WITH US
IMMIGRATION IS BEAUTIFUL NO WALL
OUR CHILDREN NEED SCHOOL NOT PRISONS
DON'T BUY GRAPE SUPPORT CUCUMBER POWER
VIVA LA RAZA
AGROBUSINESS EXPLOITS LABOR
STRIKE BOYCOTT GRAPE
NEWA
Tierra Justicia
New Technology
New Voices!

Chicano newspapers generally belonged to one of three categories: organizational, independent community, and university. Publications were typically eight-page tabloids designed, written, and edited by a collective of activists who were motivated to serve ‘la causa’ (the cause). Instead of using advertisements to generate revenue, publications sought subscriptions and donations from their audience in order to remain truly independent and avoid conflicts of interest (Figure 2). Because of the affordability of offset printing, most Chicano publications were sold for mere cents or freely offered to raise awareness and encourage activism within the movement.

While larger, white-controlled media outlets often failed to report the harsh working conditions, economic inequality, and social oppression of Mexican Americans in the 1960s and 1970s, independent Chicano publications became a critical outlet for local news and information absent from the national narrative. Activists argued Chicano publications needed their own publications to combat disinformation in their communities because the mainstream press could not be trusted. Reporters from the Texas Farm Workers Union (TFWU) publication El Cuchamí (San Juan, TX) commented on the disrespect broadcasters showed workers, for example laughing on air when the union lost an election. “Because we are meek,” the paper exclaimed, “the educated think we are stupid and they abuse that humility that characterizes us to the point of defrauding us.” Chicano publications like El Cuchamí sought to energize their readers to resist such characterizations.

Cesar Chavez was an integral figure in launching and uniting the Chicano movement. In 1965, Chavez established the United Farm Workers’ (UFW) publication El Malcriado (Kern, CA) to give the farmworkers a “voice” where they could speak to the injustices they endured. Through the paper, Chavez pleaded with the audience to cast their fears aside and unite. Chavez recruited Bill Esher, a New Yorker who had headed west to work as editor of the newspaper. Chavez understood the process of

AUTHORS & DESIGNERS
Joshua Gutierrez
Alexandria Canchola

COVER ILLUSTRATOR
Alexandria Canchola

---

Fig. 2: This solicitation, featured in a 1976 issue of El Cuchamí, identifies some of the tools and supplies needed by the designer-activist seeking to communicate their message through print. The comical phrase, “in one word: everything,” suggested their current lack of resources.
producing the newspaper from typing and pasting up to the late-night search for cover images. The Farm Worker Press did not have much equipment to put the paper together; they began with an IBM executive electric typewriter and eventually upgraded to a "justewriter" machine that typed copy into tidy columns. To save on photography expenses, the Press relied on scissors and glue to cut pictures out of newspapers or magazines. This economically efficient system served the movement without taking funding away from the union. At the height of distribution, El Malcriado had a bi-weekly circulation of over 30,000 copies.9

The activists responsible for putting out most of these publications were volunteers who were not professionally trained in design, but their work became visually refined as time progressed (Figures 8 and 9). A comparison between the first issues of El Malcriado and the last shows that the page design shifted over time, eventually showcasing standard features of publication design such as use of a column grid, exceptional typesetting, and consistent typographical hierarchy. Because the publications were typically designed by small collectives working collaboratively, it's difficult to determine if one specific person oversaw layout.

Gloria Arellanes, from the Brown Berets' organizational newspaper La Causa (Los Angeles, CA), commented on how Chicanas in the organization determined the layout, wrote stories, and created graphics together in the evenings after the Berets' free clinic closed for the night. Caracol (San Antonio, TX) was the only publication we researched that listed the designer alongside traditional roles such as typesetter, illustrator, and editor.

Supporters of the movement were recruited to work on the newspapers. Carlos Marentes explained that he did not have funds to donate to the Texas Farm Workers Union (TFWU) so Antonio Oreondain, leader of the TFWU, suggested he get involved by working on the newspaper. Marentes recalls that a member of the Board of Directors told him that he was in charge of TFWU's newspaper El Clubamit. "It is your duty, your responsibility." Marentes proudly shared that when he began, they published 500 papers every month and at the end of his tenure they were printing 3,000-5,000 papers every two weeks across the nation. Anna Nieto Gomez, one of the founders of Hijos de Cuahhtémoc (Long Beach, CA), a groundbreaking publication of Chicana feminist activism discussed how they would assemble the newspaper. "We typed out the articles with an electric typewriter, we used cement glue to paste the writings, poetry, and artwork onto newspaper layout boards. When we were finally ready, we set up public speaking engagements to raise money to pay the printer." Access to common tools, a passion for the cause, and the necessity to rapidly spread information inspired activist teams to continually publish.
A key distinction of the Chicano movement was a call to the former glory of the Mexican-controlled Americas in today's Southwestern and Western United States. This mythical and ancestral region, known as "Aztlan," embodies Chicano identity and pride as descendants from great Mesoamerican civilizations that predated colonial dominance and Anglo theft of land. Aztlan was a rallying call to embrace this new identity "la raza" or "the race." It was important for Chicanos to find pride in their Mexican heritage (indigenous ancestry, specifically) during a time of heightened racial and ethnic discrimination.

Chicano publications referenced Aztlan in both name and imagery and were critical in building the imagination of this mythical land, making it a reality through print. Titles such as Hijas de Cuahétamoc (Long Beach, CA), El Latino Americano (San Diego, CA), ¡Es Tiempol! (Los Altos Hills, CA) show symbols, graphics, and patterns inspired by Mexican Mesoamerican traditions (Figures 3-7). They were typically placed near the masthead where readers could quickly identify symbols connected to the Chicano movement even when a newspaper was folded. Common in editorial design, covers often displayed their city and country of origin as a location in Aztlan instead of the modern United States. ¡Ahora! was distributed from Center, Colorado, Aztlan; Barrio from Corpus Christi, Tejas, Aztlan; and Regeneración II from El Valle, Tejastan (a clever Spanish word combination referring to the Rio Grande Valley of Southern Texas).

Many of the publications from this period were influenced by the design and visual iconography of the United Farm Workers (UFW) and looked to showcase affiliation with this cause. Logos provided visual consistency and political unity across these widespread publications. El Malcriado, (Reno, CA) the official newspaper of the UFW used an upside-down Aztec pyramid as its logo (Figure 5). The UFW's recognizable branding was visually sparse and simple enough to replicate by photocopying, becoming the unofficial emblem and cultural icon of the Chicano rights movement. El Malcriado aided the UFW's notoriety, relying on the geometric "Aztec" eagle, Nuestra Lucha (Toledo, OH), ¡Ahora! ¡Es Tiempol! and La Lomita (Robstown, TX) also used a variation of the eagle to visually unify the greater UFW movement (Figure 7).

This logo was stamped on growers on the bags of grapes to show solidarity with union workers. Strikes and boycotts helped build recognition of the eagle icon throughout the country. One grower, Henry Ryder, asked to sign a contract with the United Farm Workers Union solely to win back customers. "I just want that Union label so that I can sell my grapes." The black eagle icon featured on publications, campaigns, and products gave people a way to visually connect the union's efforts and messaging.
The Aztec deity Quetzalcoatl played a critical role in the Aztec creation story. The use of Pre-Columbian iconography reinforced the connection to historical fights for social justice, lending a mythical, spiritual quality to the movement’s political struggles. The newspaper includes Mesoamerican geometric patterns as borders and dividers. Here, again, is the eagle and snake imagery that refers to the foundation myth of the Aztec capital, Tenochtitlan.
Mastheads Call Attention

The masthead identifies a publication and must have enough weight to stand out from a cluttered background. Newspaper mastheads benefit from being distinctive, recognizable, and appropriate for the topic and audience. Like logos, a good masthead is still recognizable when partially obscured.

The masthead typography of Chicano publications from the 1960's and 1970's denoted various sources of influence. Activists worked to combine text and images into layout. They built a visual narrative linking post-Mexican Revolution art ideologies, indigenous populations, colonial-era Rococo and Victorian styles, Aztec-inspired patterns (Figures 6b-d), elements from Mexican street-brush script, informal calligraphy, and woodblock and linocut lettering.21

The mastheads of Chicano publications play with aesthetic conventions associated with Mexican or indigenous design and reposition such typographic explorations outside the expected standards of professionalism. There is a noticeable break from clarity of communication to that of visual engagement and connection with “la causa.” It would seem the ability to inject the right personality of rebellion into the work was far more critical. Many Chicano publications adopted an urgent and dynamic visual style in their mastheads. Techniques such as woodcut or linocut illustrations appear in the mastheads of La Lomita (Robstown, TX), Inside The Beats (San Diego, CA), Caracol (San Antonio, TX), and El Carrito del Norte (Española, NM).

The mastheads appear transgressive (though due to a gap in the historical record, it is impossible to know if their creators intended for them to be so). Mastheads like Barrio (Corpus Christi, TX) look handcrafted which could be interpreted as a rejection of corporate mainstream news organizations. Outside of the Chicano Times (San Antonio, TX), most of the mastheads of the era appear to be a celebration of Chicano culture: there is a sense of informality and an emphasis on strong and decorative typographical forms. The dynamic compositions and styles function as mechanisms for generating attention and creating community. The lack of immediate legibility however does not preclude recognition altogether. Instead of abiding by design’s rules or philosophies, the mastheads often draw design inspiration from sources outside of printed media. Caracol’s masthead (1975-76) incorporated a stall to represent “a spiral of self-expansion and was inspired by Oliver Wendell Holmes’ poem The Chambered Nautilus.”22 The swagger and flair of its design make for a more memorable identity. There is a bold dialogue between the merging of word and image.

These publications also connected to the Chicano identity through their use of language. Most of the masthead titles are in Spanish, even though the majority of the publications were either written in English or bilingual. As scholar Chon Noriega has observed, “For Chicano artists, playing with words involves two languages, Spanish and English, as well as all the hybrid spaces between them:’calo, Spanglish, code switching, and interlingual puns.”23 In this way, despite often targeting an English-speaking audience, the publications would use Spanish to associate themselves with the

---

CONTINUED ON PAGE 7
El Malcriado
"La Voz del Campesino"
1965-1973

1972-1975

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 6

movement. Intentional design decisions like screaming headlines, shocking images, Chicano symbolism, and bilingual typesetting encouraged readers to mobilize and fight injustice. Ahora! (Center, CO) is representative of this strategic design strategy – a publication title in Spanish with bilingual articles to communicate with multiple audiences.

Not all the publications of the era rebelled against conventional newspaper design. In fact, those that didn’t often saw higher readership. El Malcriado had the largest circulation and appealed to a wide range of audiences, seeking partnerships with political allies to impact legislation. With only one rebrand, El Malcriado’s masthead changed little over the course of its twelve-year run (Figure 9). Its enduring identity contrasted with other publications that struggled to settle on a visual identity. Transformations of El Cuhamil (San Juan, TX), La Gente (Los Angeles, CA) and Caracol show evolution in the masthead over time. El Cuhamil (Figure 8) was in constant flux, with elements of its masthead changing almost every year. Loud, bold, decorative lettering shifted to simplified typographic forms that looked polished but lacked the personality of its initial brand.

At their core, the mastheads capture cultural spirit and Mexican heritage to create Chicano identity.

Fig 8: El Malcriado was rebranded only once during its twelve-year run. The switch to all caps condensed sans-serif reflects a shift to a more commanding tone. The photo background evokes a sense of unrest that feels more closely aligned with the sentiment of the Chicano Movement.

Fig 8: Over the years, El Cuhamil’s masthead iconography subtly changed. The image of the shaded oak tree continued to be refined and simplified. By using the farm worker icon, they visually separated themselves from the United Farm Workers Union by branding themselves with unique iconography created specifically for the Texas Farm Workers Union.

Fig 8: Translation: “The voice of the farm worker.” This slogan was featured prominently in early editions of El Malcriado and was updated in 1972 to “The official voice of the United Farm Workers” conveying a more authoritative voice to the newspaper.
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Years</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>The Latin Messenger</td>
<td>August 1967</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BRONZE</td>
<td>November 1968</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>La Hormiga</td>
<td>October 1968</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chicano Movement</td>
<td>November 1968</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CSM</td>
<td>March 1969</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>El Grito del Norte</td>
<td>December 1969</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>La Voz de Robe</td>
<td>May 1971</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CEBRA</td>
<td>October 1972</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Papel Chicano</td>
<td>May 1973</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Inside the Beast</td>
<td>1972</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>LA VERDAD</td>
<td>1969</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>La Verdad</td>
<td>1970</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>La Lucha</td>
<td>1970</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>LOMITA</td>
<td>May 1975</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>EL BARRIO</td>
<td>September-October 1970</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BARRIO</td>
<td>November 1971</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Papel Chicano</td>
<td>1970</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Papel Chicano</td>
<td>1971</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Papel Chicano</td>
<td>1971</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Papel Chicano</td>
<td>1971</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Papel Chicano</td>
<td>1976</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>El MESTIZO</td>
<td>1976</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>El MESTIZO</td>
<td>1977</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>EL MAIZAL</td>
<td>May 1977</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>EL Latino Americano</td>
<td>March 1978</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Notes:
- The table lists various publications with their respective years of publication.
An Index of Chicano Mastheads

CARACOL
September 1974
August 1975
September 1976

HIJAS DE CUAUHTÉMOC
1968-1973

LA GENTE
May 1971
March 1972
April 1973
March 1977

EL GALLO
25¢

Florenciendo
May 1979
March 1978

EN EL FREnte
Worth a Thousand Words

As illustrated on the covers of these publications, the bond between art and activism was key traits of the Chicano movement. These covers were printed with a combination of bilingual text and bilingual imagery relying on cultural specificity, symbols, and visual metaphors to convey their message. Artwork within these publications was blended with Mexican iconography, Catholic religious symbolism, and self-referential pre-Columbian-inspired motifs (Figures 6a-d), creating a distinct aesthetic to advance the Chicano movement. Important figures from the Aztec culture, like deity Quetzalcoatl, appeared in order to establish connection between the movement and the mythology of the Aztec empire (Figures 6a). Pictured on the covers of Chicano publications from the 1960’s and 1970’s were scenes of revolution, solidarity, indigeneity of the community, labor, boycotts, and motherhood. These representations contrasted with the negative stereotypes of Chicanos present in mainstream media.

Beginning in 1965, the United Farm Workers’ (UFW) national boycott of California table grapes, known as the Delano grape strike, influenced the art and design of Chicano publications across the country. The papers urged readers to join the boycott in solidarity. Perhaps because the UFW’s leader, Cesar Chavez, admired the woodcuts and pen-and-ink drawings that emerged from the Mexican Revolution, the UFW’s paper, El Malcriado (Keene, CA), “drew a link between the farm workers’ struggle for justice in the U.S.A. and the peasant struggle for justice in the Mexican Revolution (1910-1920).” Important figures of the Mexican Revolution, like Emiliano Zapata, graced the early covers of El Malcriado along with well-known slogans like “Better to die on your feet than live on your knees...”14

Boycotts  Community  CATHOLICISM

Revolution  MOTHERHOOD  indigenous roots

Andy Zermeño was the first artist commissioned by Cesar Chavez to create artwork for the UFW. Zermeño used cartoons (Figure 12) to communicate broadly across bilingual and bicultural audiences. His iconic characters Don Solaco, Don Coyote, and El Patrocino were often published both inside and on the cover of El Malcriado. Don Solaco portrays a union farmworker striking against agribusiness and representing the capacity of the individual to stand up in the fight against oppressive institutions. Don Coyote was a sleazy labor contractor who cheated farmworkers, and greedy El Patrocino was the pompously powerful agribusiness employer.25

Many other publications including El Cuhami (San Juan, TX), published in South Texas, borrowed this comic style.

With the Civil Rights Movement taking place simultaneously, El Malcriado showcased an alliance with this parallel movement by including an image created by Black artist Elizabeth Catlett of a Black Madonna and Child (Figure 13) printed in 1965, on the cover of the newspaper’s 18th issue. In the following issue, El Malcriado’s editor Bill Esher described the movement’s excitement as more Americans confronted the injustices suffered by vulnerable populations.25

Doug Adair, a writer for El Malcriado, speaks of the “explosion of activity in the student and especially Chicano communities” as activists visited the El Malcriado office asking how to begin their own newspapers. The UFW supported their endeavors by providing them with a type of mentorship, offering guidance on layout and paste-up, as well as permission to use stories and cartoons from El Malcriado in their own publications. This camaraderie between publications also existed between organizational and independent-community newspapers. Adair comments, “We also had an easy relationship with the radical and alternative press.”25 These partnerships between publications allowed for an aesthetic cohesion to develop across Chicano publication design.

Many Chicanas were involved in the movement, and some even created publications that were entirely female led. In the publication Hijas de Cuautémoc (Long Beach, CA) women shared their perspectives and experiences. Anna Nieto Gomez, founder, remembers, “The newspaper was beautiful, the cover page was a graphic of a strong looking woman holding a machete breaking out from underneath a gigantic net.” While some arms of the movement told women to return to their traditional roles, publications like Hijas de Cuautémoc offered demonstrations of resistance (Figure 15). For Gomez, being an activist offered women the opportunity to work as equals with men. Women made their own decisions and over time the Chicano Press shared women’s resistance with published essays by Chicana feminists who wrote about the conditions of and for women in the movement.28

CONTINUED ON PAGE 15
EN EL FREnte (ON THE FRONT)

LA VErDAD, 1970

LA HORMIGA, 1968
Several of the Chicano publication covers utilize printmaking methodologies such as lithography and relief. This graphic style features dynamic line work and rough, hand-carved illustrations of black ink on light newsprint (Figures 14). The stark contrast of positive and negative space creates readability and demands attention. This aesthetic is a form of branding, a way to show that these publications belonged to the cause.

The covers of Chicano publications heavily relied on photography and collage. A few of the university-student Chicano publications listed photographers on their staff. The cover of UCLA’s La Gente de Acción (Los Angeles, CA) gave Carlos García a byline as photographer. However, many of the photos that graced the covers were submitted by readers. Sometimes they were unattributed or were turned into collages. A 1973 issue of El Grito del Norte (Española, NM) commemorates the movement in New Mexico with a large collage made up of photos submitted by the paper’s readers (Figure 16).

The imagery of the movement is defined by the freedom found within independent publishing. Designer-activists of this period created newspapers that communicated the Chicano experience through art, design, and writing, forever capturing and mobilizing the movement.

The imagery of the movement is defined by the freedom found within independent publishing. Designer-activists of this period created newspapers that communicated the Chicano experience through art, design, and writing, forever capturing and mobilizing the movement.
Thanks

Special thanks to the staff at the Special Collections, Mary and Jeff Bell Library, Texas A&M University-Corpus Christi, Corpus Christi, TX, Department of Special Research Collections, UC Santa Barbara Library, (University of California Santa Barbara, Santa Barbara, California), Special Collections and Archives, University Library, (University of Texas Rio Grande Valley, Edinburg, Texas), Special Collections, Doheny Memorial Library (University of Southern California, Los Angeles, CA), and UCLA Chicano Studies Research Center, UCLA Library (University of California Los Angeles, Los Angeles, CA) for assisting our research. We are grateful for the editing support and encouragement of Maggie Taft.
References

Rodriguez, E. “Covering the Chicano Movement: Examining Chicano Activism through Chicano, American, African American, and Spanish-Language

---

Biography

Alexandria Canchola designs, illustrates, and creates immersive large-scale installations that are inspired by personal and socio-culturally informed narratives, explorations of diverse color palettes, experimentations with letterforms, and filmmaking. Her idiosyncratic approach to design stems from her desire to empower diverse groups of people and individuals, and make a positive difference in their lives by crafting and disseminating engaging and meaningful design and artwork. She has fulfilled many creative and design-rooted roles on behalf of publications, small businesses, and non-profits as she strives to synthesize their original, creative ideas with hers.

Alexandria has a Bachelor of Arts from University of Texas at Austin, and an MFA in 2D Design from University of Texas Rio Grande Valley. She is an Assistant Professor at Texas A&M University–Corpus Christi who eagerly working to assist her students in their quest to construct and acquire knowledge so they may fully understand the power they wield as designers in communicating ideas that have the potential to instigate and sustain positive change. She can be reached via email at: alexandria.canchola@tamucc.edu
Joshua Duttweiler is a designer, artist, and educator. His multi-disciplinary practice encompasses personal, collaborative, and client-based projects that are focused on social justice and community building. Largely inspired by his ever-changing locations, his work is a critical exploration of historical and present-day societal systems and constructs. Joshua asks his audiences to consider the spaces they occupy from a wide variety of perspectives as means to allow them to hear and respond to new voices.

Joshua holds an MFA in Graphic Design from Boston University in Boston, Massachusetts, U.S.A. He regularly exhibits and curates work nationally and internationally. He currently resides in Corpus Christi, Texas where he is an Assistant Professor at Texas A&M University–Corpus Christi. As an educator, he seeks to empower his students to positively change the world with their empathetically informed, original ideas for creating visual communications, systems, and services. He can be reached via email at: joshua.duttweiler@tamucc.edu